Video recording: I talked about the assignment briefly in the lecture, the recording is here.

1 Introduction

Automatic monitoring of large-scale infrastructure is an important part of engineering operations. This assignment is inspired by [1] which uses a thermal camera mounted on a drone to monitor the operation of the photovoltaic cells in photovoltaic plants.

Figure 1 shows 12 thermal images taken from [1]. Each image is used to visualise the temperature on the surface of a photovoltaic module. The temperature range in these images is from 30 to 60 degree Celsius. These images have been plotted as grey-scale images where a temperature of 30 degree Celsius will appear black and a temperature of 60 degree Celsius will appear white. A photovoltaic module in normal operation should look relatively dark (which means a low surface temperature) as in the top-left image in Figure 1. However, those modules that are not operating normally have different profiles for their thermal images. For example, the second image from the left in the bottom row shows a module with 2 hot cells which appear as 2 white squares (i.e. high temperature) in the thermal image. A large photovoltaic plant will have many modules so it would be advantageous if we can automatically identify those modules that are not operating correctly.

In this assignment, you will write Python programs to process thermal images in order to determine the operating status of the photovoltaic modules.

Note that we chose the word inspired earlier because we have adapted the work in [1] as a programming assignment by simplifying and liberally changing a few aspects of the original problem. In particular, we have made changes so that, in this assignment, you will have to use the various Python and numpy constructs that you have learnt. So, the primary aim of this assignment is to give you an opportunity to use the various programming methods and techniques that you have learnt. The secondary aim is to give you a taste on how computing can be used to solve and automate some real-life engineering problems.

1.1 Learning objectives

By completing this assignment, you will learn:

- To apply a number of numpy features, which include array, indexing, slicing, statistical functions, elementwise computation, Boolean indexing and others.
- To consolidate the basic Python programming skills that you have learnt.
