Abstract

The atmospheric levels of carbon dioxide (CO₂) has risen from preindustrial levels of 280 ppm to present levels of 387.18 ppm contributing to increase in average global temperature by 0.74°C between 1906 and 2005 and has subsequent lead to climate change in terms of global warming. Further, it is estimated that the atmospheric concentration of CO₂ might rise to between 540 and 940 ppm by the year 2100. Hence, it is inevitable to reduce the CO₂ concentration in the atmosphere. Forests play a crucial role in global carbon cycle as a large terrestrial carbon sink and are responsible for fixing 30 per cent of all anthropogenic CO₂ emissions from fossil fuels. Significant amount of carbon, which is as much as double the amount of carbon in the atmosphere, is stored in the forests. Forestry based mitigation strategies to combat climate change can be achieved by reducing carbon emissions that are caused from deforestation and degradation, increasing the amount of forested land through a reforestation and afforestation process, and increasing the carbon density of existing forests at stand and landscape scale and expanding the use of forest products that will sustainably replace fossil-fuel emissions for electricity and fuel. This goal to store carbon through forestry can be integrated with traditional aims such as soil and water conservation, wildlife protection, recreation and more importantly wood production. Thus, management interventions which are expedient to meet such traditional aims in forestry can also be applied to enhance carbon sequestration through trees. The present paper appraises the important forestry options available to enhance carbon sequestration through trees which are vital in forest based climate change mitigation activities.

Key words: Climate change mitigation, carbon sequestration,
