ABSTRACT: Feline idiopathic megacolon is a relatively common colonic disorder characterized by severe distention of the colon. A thorough diagnostic investigation is needed to eliminate other potential causes from the list of diagnostic differentials. Medical management consisting of dietary modification and administration of laxatives, enemas, and/or promotility agents may be effective. Patients refractory to medical therapy should be further evaluated to determine whether they are candidates for subtotal colectomy.

Feline idiopathic megacolon is characterized by generalized colonic dysfunction manifesting as severe colonic dilation and fecal impaction. Clinical signs commonly include anorexia, weight loss, vomiting, and dyschezia; physical examination classically reveals a large amount of very firm feces palpable within the colon. Diagnostic investigation is aimed at ruling out underlying problems that could cause colonic stricture and/or obstruction (see box on page 659). Once this has been done, medical management with dietary modification and administration of laxatives, enemas, and/or promotility agents may be effective. Patients refractory to medical therapy may benefit from surgical intervention via subtotal colectomy.

PATHOPHYSIOLOGY

Feline idiopathic megacolon has traditionally been attributed to primary neurogenic and degenerative neuromuscular disorders. Previous investigations by Washabau et al^{1,2} using in vitro isometric stress measurements of colonic smooth muscle segments revealed that cats with idiopathic dilated megacolon developed less isometric stress in circular and longitudinal smooth muscle in response to neurotransmitters, membrane depolarization, and electrical field stimulation compared with healthy controls. These findings were associated with decreased myosin light-chain phosphorylation, suggesting a disturbance of intracellular calcium mobilization² and signifying that feline idiopathic megacolon is a generalized dysfunction of colonic smooth muscle. Thus colonic motility may be augmented with therapeutic intervention designed to stimulate colonic smooth muscle.

DIAGNOSIS

Constipation is defined as "a condition in which bowel movements are infrequent or incomplete"; severe constipation is often referred to as obstipation.³ Obstipation implies permanent loss of colonic motility, and when obstipation results in dilation or hypertrophy of the colon, the condition is called megacolon.³
