

Gibson Les Paul Traditional & 2008 Standard £1,399-£1,499 & £1,599-£1,699

What we want to know

1 Do we need more Les Pauls?
There's always room for one in your collection, isn't there? These two new-for-2008 models don't chase a late 1950s vibe: the Traditional looks back to the Standard of the past two decades and the 2008 Standard looks forward.

2 Gibson is using the Pick machine to set up its guitars, correct?
Yes, on certain models. It's a complex computer-driven set-up process that allows very fine control over, in Gibson's terms, fret height, and shape and nut cutting. Last month's ES-335 was Pick'd, as are the 2008 Standard and Traditional on review here. For more info: <http://www.pick.com>

3 Who's gonna play these?
With its weight-relieving (not chambered) body and '57 Classics the Traditional is a great Les Paul for creamy thick-toned rock. The 2008 Standard is chambered and features BurstBucker Pros for an edgier, older-style Les Paul tone. Your choice.

It's 50 years since Gibson unveiled the standard Les Paul Standard, kicking off the journey of an initially far-from-popular instrument. Now, along with Fender's Stratocaster, it's become the world's most popular and recognisable electric guitar. Like Fender, Gibson has various historically accurate reissues available, but has also chosen in 2008 to release a new Standard, and introduce a new Traditional model. The former spices up the classic recipe, the latter pays homage to the modern Les Paul manufactured during the past couple of decades.

With outwardly similar vibes, a hidden difference lies within the bodies. The Traditional is primarily all-solid with what Gibson calls weight-relieving holes, laurelwood to keep a cap on the increasingly weighty mahogany available to mass production guitar companies. "Back in the early 1980s, when Gibson started weight-relieving the Les Paul models, there was not a specific rhyme or reason to the weight-relief holes," says Frank Johnson of Gibson USA, and it's this method that's used on the Traditional. The new Standard advertises an enlarged neck-nut plus a properly chambered body to, again, trim weight and add resonance. "We wanted to focus on a more scientific approach to weight-relieving our guitars, to update the design to give it more of a purpose with both tone and weight in mind." Time to open the cases then...

Les Paul Traditional

Running your eyes and hands over this one you're reminded – if necessary – just what a great design the Les Paul is. There's a timeless quality to its simplistic rounded outline, which makes subsequent attempts at "inspired by" single-cuts look lumpy and, well, just wrong. Pulling it out of its case, however, you're reminded of the heft and weight. With a max body depth of 50mm, and a rim depth of 50mm, the rise of the gently curved violin-like top is quite subtle and less pronounced than many other brands' single-cuts. The 6mm thick maple top is two-piece, as usual, with a subtle down- and flaring enhanced by the old-looking mid-brown to golden amber sunbursting. Of course, there's no back contouring, it's flat, with a smaller-than-Fender edge radius and single cream-bound top edge. The scrapping of the binding, to remove the red-based lacquer used to enrich the mahogany of the back and neck, is clean but not 100 per cent precise. The binding itself on both body and neck looks a little thick, certainly thicker than vintage, but visually ties in the cream pickup surrounds and pickguard nicely.

Although the mahogany body is centre-joined, the neck is one piece save for the headstock-widening wings. Classed as a 1959 profile it's big and round though, unlike the Melody Maker reviewed elsewhere in this issue, it's extremely well shaped on the shoulders. It really doesn't feel overly clunky in the hand. As per vintage spec the iconic headstock is back-angled 17 degrees putting a lot of pressure on getting the string grooves in the nut smooth and snug-fine, which they are. The Tune-Pro/Kluson tremol combine storage appearance leave for the more modern locking mechanisms on the face of the headstock with a more stable string post and higher gear ratio. They're smooth and precise without feeling over-tight or too sloppy. The fretwork on the rather dry and dirty brown rosewood board, with its backhairs, and again rather dirty-looking peaked edges, is good, though the fret profile is still a little too square for our liking and these binding ribs are not as well shaped as the Memphis Custom Shop ES-335 we recently evaluated. But it's all part of the quite distinct feel of the modern

The [Traditional's] combination of the two '57 Classics and the standard Gibson control harness creates the expected full-fat creamy tones that many modern Les Paul owners will know as home
