Introduction

Since the first published report of a percutaneous endoscopic gastrostomy (PEG) in 1980 by Gauderer and Ponsky,<sup>1</sup> the procedure has been modified and improved several times. It has now replaced the surgical gastrostomy (Witzel gastrostomy, Stamm gastrostomy, Janeway gastrostomy) which was associated with a markedly higher rate of complications.<sup>2,3</sup> Placement of a PEG/PEJ (percutaneous endoscopic jejunostomy) tube is simple, safe and well-tolerated by patients.<sup>4–7</sup> There is a wide range of diets and nutrient preparations suitable for tube feeding currently available. Modern PEG tube systems made of polyurethane or silicone rubber are easy to insert and well-tolerated. Clinicians have a broad spectrum of low risk, practicable, patient-orientated forms of enteral nutritional therapy available. PEG-feeding, therefore, has rapidly spread to become routine practice worldwide and is currently the method of choice for medium- and long- term enteral feeding.

Recent studies have provided new information on the benefits and drawbacks of PEG-feeding. We have a clearer appreciation of ethical issues surrounding artificial enteral feeding. Since we started placing percutaneous enteral tube systems by endoscopic techniques nearly 25 years ago<sup>1</sup> our attitude towards this method has changed in many ways: in the early days PEG-tubes were often used in patients in the advanced state of predominantly malignant diseases; this is now regarded as an inappropriate indication in most cases being too late to offer adequate clinical benefits to the patients in terms of nutritional status and quality of life. Data from a large number of recently
