Women, Disability, and Culture Anna Siri, 2020 Women and girls with disabilities find themselves constantly having to deal with multiple intersectional discrimination due to both their gender and their disability as well as social conditioning. Indeed the intersection made up of factors such as race ethnic origin social background cultural substrate age sexual orientation nationality religion gender disability status as refugee or migrant and others besides has a multiplying effect that increases discrimination yet further. Where conditions are equal women with disabilities do not enjoy equal opportunities in terms of their participation in all aspects of society rather they are all too often excluded amongst others from education employment access to poverty reduction programmes from taking part in political and public lives and moreover some legislative deeds actually prevent them from making decisions regarding their own lives also as regards sexual and reproductive rights. History attitudes and prejudices of the societies to which we belong including of families have created and continue to feed into a negative stereotypical image of women and girls with disabilities thereby helping further isolate and marginalise them yet more. Very often they are also ignored by information media and when they do gain media attention the approach tends to consider them from the perspective of medical assistance needs silencing their abilities and valuable contribution to the society in which they live. The book seeks to pay the right attention to the condition of women with disabilities offering points for reflection also on the different often invisible cultural and social undertones that continue today to feed into prejudicial stereotypes.
