Jacques Cartier

In the 1334, French explorer Jacques Cartier left France in search of a Northwest Passage to Asia. On this first attempt, he sailed across the ocean to what is now Canada. He and his crew explored the Gulf of Saint Lawrence. On his second voyage, he sailed deeper into the Gulf of Saint Lawrence and up the St. Lawrence River. They stayed for a winter at a place where the temperatures were too low for the Frenchmen. He returned to France. On his third voyage in 1342, he discovered a place for a permanent settlement along the St. Lawrence River. He thought there were gold and diamonds and other minerals. Cartier was the first to discover that the "Hurons" were not Indians but were people who came from the Huron Indians' world.
