E. V. Borio,Andrew Joseph

Filardo,2007 There has been mounting evidence that the inflation process has been changing Inflation is now much lower and much more stable around the globe And its sensitivity to measures of economic slack and increases in input costs appears to have declined Probably the most widely supported explanation for this phenomenon is that monetary policy has been much more effective There is no doubt in our mind that this explanation goes a long way towards explaining the better inflation performance we have observed In this paper however we begin to explore a complementary rather than alternative explanation We argue that prevailing models of inflation are too country centric in the sense that they fail to take sufficient account of the role of global factors in influencing the inflation process The relevance of a more globe centric approach is likely to have increased as the process of integration of the world economy has gathered momentum a process commonly referred to as globalisation In a large cross section of countries we find some rather striking prima facie evidence that this has indeed been the case In particular proxies for global economic slack add considerable explanatory power to traditional benchmark inflation rate equations even allowing for the influence of traditional indicators of external influences on domestic inflation such as import and oil prices Moreover the role of such global factors has been growing over time especially since the 1990s And in a number of cases global factors appear to have supplanted the role of domestic measures of economic slack     Subject Guide to Children's Books in Print 1997 Bowker Editorial Staff,R R Bowker Publishing,1996-09
